

Dr. Prodromou is a Visiting Associate Professor of Conflict Resolution at The Fletcher School at Tufts University. Before this she taught at Harvard University where she co-chaired the Southeastern Europe Study Group and Muslims in Democratic Politics Study Group. She has also taught at Boston University, where she was the Coordinator of the M.A. Program in International Relations and Religion. She also previously served as Vice-Chairman of the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom between 2004–2012, and is a member of the Secretary of State's Religion and Foreign Policy Working Group. She holds a doctorate in political science from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Her research interests center on religion and security, democracy, human rights, and religious freedom. A regional expert on Southeastern Europe and the Near East, she has published widely in academic journals, including Harvard International Review, European Journal of Political Research, Social Compass, and Journal of Democracy. She co-edited Thinking Through Faith: New Perspectives from Orthodox Christian Scholars (2008). Currently, she is writing on Orthodox Christian contributions to freedom in politics and human rights.